Intro

How would you expect the sim to be different if there were a selective advantage to one trait?

After 6 generations, how many rabbits show the dominant phenotype? The recessive phenotype?

Can you determine the genotype of the rabbits in this simulation? If so, what is it?

Do you predict most or few rabbits will show the recessive mutation versus no mutation after 6 generations? Explain.

How would you expect the simulation to be different if there were a selective advantage to one trait? Which traits appear to give a selective advantage against hunger in the simulation? Explain why you think so.

In general terms, how does a phenotype provide a selective advantage to an animal?

How does the result of the simulation change when you introduce the advantageous mutation as a recessive mutation?

How does the rabbit population change when there is a Selection Factor in the population, in contrast to the No Selection simulation?

Which phenotype do you predict will be the most common after 9 generations? Q12- When we perform the simulation, was your prediction correct?

When wolves are performing natural selection, which phenotype(s) give(s) the selective advantage?
 What do the rabbits that are most likely to survive look like under the conditions in this part?
 How does the simulation change when the advantageous trait is dominant vs. recessive?
 How does the choice of environment influence natural selection? Do you get the same or different results in the Arctic and at the Equator?

8 bay slatted sheep shed in Cahersiveen, Co Kerry

Built in 1986, originally timber slats were used

The shed holds 320 ewes

There is a 2ft clearance between the slats and the concrete floor below for manure to build

This is an adequate storage space for an annual housing period

The slats sit on steel runners and are removed prior to cleaning with tractor loader

The manure is removed during the summer and tipped into an outdoor slurry tank

Every couple of days the farmer cleans any silage off the slats with a garden rake to prevent slots clogging up
